For the next ten minutes everything they could to quiet the passengers and alongside the track, over which they walked to the station at Fiftieth street. The passengers on the rear train went to the Forty-second street station.

The uptown track was blockaded all morning. A gang of men brought derricks and wrecking tools and endeavored to get the car back to the track.

The blockade of cars extended at one time on the uptown track to Twenty-third street, but by switching to a single track between Forty-second and Sixty-first streets trains were finally run in both directions.

Just at the moment of the collision a surface car was passing on the tracks below and in the excitement two women in that car fainted.

of water that came from the broken tank of the engine above. The people in the street who witnessed the accident say it looked as if the rear train came up at full speed. One of the pastengers on the rear car was an old peddler. He ran out to the platform yelling and threw his pack to the street. He was preparing to jump after it when a train man pulled him back. The panic among the frightened passengers lasted only a few minutes, and quiet was restored as soon as they realised that no one had been hurt, and that they were in no further danger. The derailed car was placed upon the tracks again and taken down to the
